Did you see in the paper the other day where the Los Angeles County Air Pollution Control officers went down to the International Airport to enforce the new State law which prohibits aircraft from spewing too much smoke into the air? They stationed themselves strategically at each runway, binoculars and stop watches in hand, to catch the carbon-spewing jets ... but they found they had a bit of a problem; the smog was so bad it was hard to see the aircraft, much less the exhaust! No citations were issued and the inspector returned to headquarters to mull over what to do next in the Smog Capital of the World
